AFFLE's growth drivers remain intact and it continues to be our preferred internet stock; reiterate BUY with TP of Rs 1,720

 We expect no impact on digital advertisers for at least two years and smooth transition thereafter led by Google's collaborative approach

Google's new privacy measures: In a multiyear initiative termed Privacy Sandbox, Google plans to develop more privacy-focused replacements for the alphanumeric identifiers associated with individual smartphones that some apps use to gather and share information about users. In its official statement, Google emphasised that the new solution will help (1) publishers generate revenue from advertising inventory, and (2) advertisers secure value for money from advertising spend (see press release).

Key proposed changes: Some of Google's work-in-progress proposals are Topics API (interest-based ad system) and FLEDGE (a system that allows advertisers to show ads based on their own definition of a "custom audience" without having to rely on individual identifiers).

Limited impact on digital advertisers: We see no short-term impact on digital advertisers as Google is committed to supporting existing Android and Chrome policies (AdID) for at least two years and has promised to provide substantial notice ahead of any possible future changes. Moreover, the replacement solution will be developed in collaboration with various industry stakeholders (developers, privacy advocates, regulators and other interested parties). Beta testing will begin by the year-end and scale up in 2023. In our view, Google's pragmatic and collaborative approach will ensure a smooth transition for digital advertisers.

Industry stakeholders see ample time for transition: Unlike Apple's iOS privacy changes, the industry response to Google's proposals is positive and acknowledges the ample time provided for the ecosystem to transition to the new solution. The Trade Desk CEO said this may have a positive business impact while Meta's Vice President of Advertising Ecosystem said it was encouraging (detailed comments on Page 2).

AFFLE's growth thesis intact; reiterate BUY: We are optimistic that AFFLE will promptly adapt to these Android changes as its technology platform already uses appographic and intent data (in principle similar to Google's proposed Topic API). AFFLE's successful growth post iOS privacy changes lends further confidence. Reiterate BUY with an unchanged TP of Rs 1,720 set at 61x FY24E P/E.
