Expert call: Gearing up for GNA

- GNA comes into effect on 1 October but key aspects of new regime remain ambiguous
- Solar power prices likely to cool further as indigenous modules and higher capacities enhance supply
- All-round renewable addition key to grid stability as excess reliance on solar capacity can cause demand-supply imbalance

We hosted an investor call with power sector expert Arun Kumar. Key takeaways:

Lower cost for power generators: General network access (GNA), which provides non-discriminatory access to the central transmission network to all power producers, will reduce overhead transmission charges in the day ahead market (DAM) from the current 30-40paise per unit paid by each the buyer and the seller. Once GNA takes effect on 1 October, only the buyer will pay this cost.

GNA still lacks clarity: Key aspects of the GNA mechanism remain unclear. For instance, Temporary GNA (TGNA) will entail a 10% higher transmission cost, the impact of which is unknown. Due to such uncertainty, power traders are currently entering three-month forward orders before the new rules set in, to ensure a smooth transition phase.

Renewable addition disappointing: The pace of renewable capacity addition in India has fallen behind policy targets and not all bids won from Solar Energy Corp (SECI) have been converted into power purchase agreements (PPA). Additionally, Kumar believes that renewable capacity addition should have a healthier mix going forward, and overweighting solar energy (as opposed to wind and hydro) may have an adverse impact on grid operations in future due to its variability.

Prices of renewable power to drop: Kumar believes that prices of power from renewable sources will decline significantly over the next 3-4 years and expects a long-term average solar power price of Rs 2-2.25/kWh from the current ~Rs 3/kWh. He expects coal prices to remain stable in the near term as the country has adequate reserves along with access to global supply.

Stabilising the grid: The variability of wind and solar sources that can only produce electricity when weather conditions are right is an area of concern for the government. To prevent failures on this account, it is exploring the areas of pumped storage hydropower, battery storage and gas-based power, besides looking to shift the demand load from non-solar hours to solar hours.

About GNA

- The new GNA regulations effective Oct'23 provide non-discriminatory access to the central transmission network to all power producers, unlike the present system where generators are required to identify a consumer prior to grant of open access.
- Buyers' access to GNA will be limited to their average consumption in the past three years. For instance, average power scheduled by a distribution company (discom) may be 1,000MW, but if its average consumption has been 700MW, then it will receive GNA only to that extent.
- Sellers are assumed to have access to the central grid and their responsibility is limited to the point of delivering power from the plant to the closest access point of the central grid. Beyond that, it is expected to be a buyer-driven market where prices are set based on demand.
- Under the current regime, power can be scheduled up to 3 months through the exchange, which will rise to 11 months once GNA takes effect.
